Job Description:

As part of the Engineering Department, you will participate in activities related to the development, research, and validation of technologies associated with the lithium systems required for the operation of the IFMIF-DONES facility. These systems, which are of high technological value, are intended for the production of a neutron source through the interaction of liquid lithium with the accelerator beam, while also managing the thermal power generated through fluid-thermodynamic processes. Their design and safe operation are critical to the efficiency and reliability of the facility.

Among the functions to be carried out are the participation in the Project bearing surfaces, secondary structures and primary installations of the envelope of the scientific infrastructure IFMIF-DONES (DONES-TOPS) and/or in the Project Foundations and primary structures of the IFMIF-DONES scientific and technical infrastructure envelope (DONES-BASE) through the development of the following activities:

- Analyze and simulate the thermo-hydrodynamic behavior of complex flows with liquid metals (or equivalent fluids) under conditions representative of the IFMIF-DONES lithium loop.
- Develop and analyze numerical codes for the study of mass and heat transfer phenomena in fluid media.
- Design and carry out complex experiments related to liquid metals (or equivalent fluids) under controlled conditions.
- Experimentally investigate the behavior of lithium in vacuum and its interaction with systems in the IFMIF-DONES accelerator vacuum line.
- Interpret experimental data and compare it with theoretical models to validate results and optimize processes and equipment.
- Investigate and characterize diagnostic systems related to the IFMIF-DONES lithium and vacuum system under controlled conditions.
- Disseminate activities and results at international conferences and meetings and publish in scientific journals.
